transplantation in the era of all-Rhesus anti-blood transfusion (ATG) immunosuppression. Adequate residual liver allograft function is of utmost importance for successful liver transplantation. While medical surveillance during follow-up is commonly performed following orthotopic liver transplantation (OLT), data on the role of surveillance following living donor liver transplantation (LDLT) are scarce. Furthermore, there are currently no published data on the incidence of steatosis in LDLT candidates, nor data on the impact of surveillance on progression to graft failure. In this retrospective study, we analyzed the role of medical surveillance on the incidence of graft loss due to liver failure and death following adult LDLT between 2011 and 2014 at the University of Miami. We found that while retransplantation (RT) occurred in 10.9% of patients, the overall incidence of graft failure and death was 2.
