According to the report, published by Georgetown University's Health Policy Institute, children who have not been taught to read at the age of 3 have on average a more than $9,000 higher median earnings than children who learn to read before the age of 4. "Although we do not know whether families are unable to spend more time at home, whether they are already burdened with other expenses, or whether there is a combination of the two, our findings suggest that learning to read at an early age may be a marker for other important socioeconomic benefits, such as more money," said the report's author, Benjamin M. Frost, a senior researcher at the Health Policy Institute. The report found that the difference in median earnings is most pronounced for "low-income families," which live on less than $35,000 a year. In those families, the income difference between the two groups rises to nearly $11,000. "This suggests that government efforts to expand access to early-childhood education programs may be most effective when supported by other programs and policies that reduce the burden of poverty on low-income families in the years prior to that education," Frost said. Frost's findings will be presented at the National Academy of Sciences "Understanding the Burden of Income Inequality: Report of the Panel on Socioeconomic Status and Health," a series of events the Academy will host March 7 through April 20.Q: pyqt qt.QtCore.QObject.__del__: Unresolved attribute reference I'm trying to make work pyqt 4.6.4 with python 3.5.1 def __del__(self): print("__del__") #self 6d1f23a050
